

Computer and Electronic Research Trends for Horticulture

John K. Schueller

University of Florida

Automation and robotic technologies are being sought to improve horticultural production. An examination of recent research trends in the area is presented, including the recent advances in computational, spectroscopic, and vision technologies. Research and development needs in mechanization and automation to improve the economic and environmental sustainability of current producers are identified.